On Day 7 of our live project, we focused on a very important goal: checking each child's current learning level so we can place them in the right classes. To do this, we brought the children up to the whiteboard one by one to test their knowledge. This individual, hands on approach gave us a clear, real time look at what each child excels at and where they might need a little extra help.

Of course, testing children one by one takes time, so we had to make sure the rest of the classroom stayed focused and supervised. While the individual assessments were happening, other team members stepped up to keep the remaining children busy, happy, and learning. We did this by teaching fun group lessons and blending education with entertainment. We played educational games, shared stories, and kept the energy high so the kids wouldn't get bored or restless while waiting for their turn.

This approach worked incredibly well. The entertainment kept the classroom calm and organized, while the whiteboard tests gave us the exact information we needed. By the end of the day, the kids had a great time, and our team gained valuable insights into everyone's learning levels. Moving forward, we will use these results to split the children into the correct class groups and design future lessons that fit their exact needs.

Overall, Day 7 was a highly successful and productive day for the project, marking a major step forward in our educational strategy. The combination of individual whiteboard testing and active group entertainment worked seamlessly together. By splitting our focus, we were able to gather critical, one-on-one data on each child's academic level without sacrificing the energy and order of the classroom. The children remained happy, engaged, and well-behaved throughout the session, and the team now has the clear insights needed to divide the kids into the correct class levels and design perfectly tailored lessons moving forward.
